Visual Cliff / 2014 / Silk, ink

Visual Cliff is based on the psychology experiment from the same name developed by Eleanor J. Gibson and R.D. Walk in 1960. The experiment placed infants on a specially designed table with a brightly colored and patterned cloth from surface to floor to test whether infants instinctually knew to be cautious of a cliff. This table cloth painting uses the same structure but optically confuses the experiment, visually erasing the cliff.

Spatula / 2014 / Oregon Pine wood

This work is part of the ongoing spatula series. The spatula came from a therapy game called the "spatula game" from 20th century psychologist, Donald Winnicott. In it, a spatula is placed on a table in reach of a child. The child grabs it and starts to play. It starts to imagine the spatula transforming into something else, perhaps an airplane waved around in delight. Because it now sees an airplane, it can dream of what an airplane can do, it can think through the imagined thing. So the spatula allows us to both extend our body to reach further and touch pancakes, but it also extends our minds because we can think further through the thing. This spatula extends through itself into multiple trajectories, possible dream lines.

About her practice:

Past and future encounters trigger my introduction of narrative structure into the mishmash of lived experience. My narratives can be personal, detached, informed by others, nonetheless directed and arranged by me. Personal mythologies unfold through my performances, not just by turning life into art, but also by placing myself in odd situations where any task might become art.

This seemingly aimless drifting is however guided by sharp-eyed observation, and perpetual interest in the surrounding world and its phenomenons. The stimulus for the works can be found anywhere from contemporary poetry to the aesthetics of a gym equipment to zen meditation to American sit-coms.

Nathalie Rias

My work is protean, it can take the form of installations, videos, performances, books, collaborations... The common denominator would be a particular interest in language and semantics, whether it is through literary references, through the revelation of hidden meanings, through the enquiry on documents and archives, through the questioning of the notion of History, or through the erasing of the frontiers between documentary and fiction. I am interested additionally in the interpretative reception of the spectators. I also do some rituals to observe small differences but I don't speculate about these recurring works.
